E-government:

- Online sites that educate or share information about federal and state government programs, laws, rules, and regulations, our country's history, plus much more.
- Most federal sources, including websites, will tell you where they got their information. With this detail you have an authoritative source for the information

“...public libraries are increasingly valuable community access points to e-government services and resources in general and during times of emergency in particular, their efforts as agents of e-government represent essentially an unfunded mandate.”

Libraries and disasters: what you can do...

- Libraries roles in disaster response – an oral history project:
<http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC2568836/>
- Be the hub of info and support if your library has not been damaged:
 - Get the word out that you have outlets to charge electronics
 - You have computers to apply for aid, contact friends/relatives etc
 - If you can, provide coffee, snacks, etc
 - Stay open longer hours

Think Joplin, MO

From their FB page 5.24.11: Joplin Public Library has computers available for internet access and will be adding more. They can be used by library card holders and non-cardholders alike for communications, completing any necessary forms etc. Also, people are welcome to charge their cell phones and laptops here.

they added wi-fi within days of the disaster
