South Dakota Public Libraries
DATA DIGEST

reflecting

We've been saying it for years: things are changing rapidly in the world of public libraries. Now a new report from the Aspen Institute (© 2014) confirms what librarians have observed at the local level: Things must change and change fast! "Rising to the Challenge: Re-Envisioning Public Libraries," calls for public leaders to take a fresh look at the economic and social impact public libraries can have on their community's growth and well-being. No longer can we afford to have a building with a "bunch of books," with a singular focus on preschool storytime or summer reading. The federal government has labeled public libraries "anchor institutions" along with other essential and enduring services needed to keep a community healthy and thriving. They are anchor institutions along with health facilities, schools, police/fire and churches. Public libraries are essential to success and progress in the digital age.

The process of re-envisioning public libraries to maximize their local impact reflects enduring principles that have always been at the center of a public library's mission--equity, access, opportunity and broad-based participation. However, public libraries need to be in the center of conversations "promoting economies of scale and broadening the library's resource reach while preserving its local presence." In the 21st century they are fundamentally about people, place and platform assets. The report goes on to state, amid societal and technological changes, "there are divides in wealth, digital inclusion and participation that threaten to widen if we as a nation do not commit to new thinking and aggressive action to provide... opportunities for all."

Challenges that face South Dakota communities are "identifying reliable sources of revenue for daily operations as well as long-term planning and investment, exploring alternative governance structures... that maximizing efficient and sustainable library operations and customer service, and measuring outcomes rather than counting activities..."

Key steps in building community leaders to support the public library include improving conversations with local leadership, strengthening intersections with diverse groups and reaching and engaging young-professional organizations, demonstrating the collective impact of partners working together.

The Aspen Institute findings are an important report for every state and local leader to read. It is available online at <http://as.pn/libraries>. Forty public libraries recently accepted a free copy of this book and are engaging their boards in a broad conversation with local leaders. We challenge you to join that local conversation to re-envision your local public library's mission and strengthen its outreach.

Institute '14

Public Library Institute, coordinated by the State Library, is a four-year continuing education program for public librarians, support staff and trustees of small public libraries. Institute is a voluntary program for South Dakota public librarians who do not hold a degree in library studies. Students meet for a week in June to attend classes on a South Dakota college campus and take additional classes online between summers that are led by State Library development staff and guest presenters. Students who attend all four years will study the areas of administration, governance, collection development, reference, young adult and children's services. Graduates of the program earn a certificate in Public Library Management.

In summer 2014, 26 students attended Library Institute. Five students graduated from the four year program: Jackie Aspelin, Sully Area Library, Onida; Rhonda Hardina, Britton Public Library; Diane Althoff, Gregory Public Library; Stacy Kvale, Bison Public Library; Kathy Connell, South Dakota State Library.

This year's studies focused on children's services and programming. Students learned about teaching and training on early childhood literacy resources, Common Core information, STEM resources, Lego Play, policies, and much more. Institute librarians took what they learned back to their communities to share with patrons and the local school librarians.
